

indicator electrode

An electrode that serves as a transducer responding to the excitation signal (if any) and to the composition of the solution being investigated, but that does not affect an appreciable change of bulk composition within the ordinary duration of a measurement.

Source:

Orange Book, p. 59